E-Waste is one of the fastest growing waste streams in the world and is expected to grow to 78 million tons annually by 2026.

In the U.S. alone, consumers dispose of some 3.2 million tons of E-Waste annually with more than 70% ending up in landfills. It's estimated that less than 30% of all e-waste undergoes any recycling globally. (Source: U.S. Environmental Protection Agency).

E-Waste recycling will play a very significant role in the coming decade and will impact a number of industries globally. The growth of the E-Waste Recycling market is driven by several factors including, the high technology rate of obsolescence, the growth of the IT industry including new and innovative technologies, and the increased buying power of individuals. In addition, the existence of valuable recyclable materials in e-waste and the circular economy movement to collect these valuable material are other major drivers of the market.

Significant improvements in the collection and recycling process and the introduction of innovative new green technologies and alternatives are needed within the sector to fully develop this secondary metal resource. EnviroLeach is poised to become a significant part of this evolution. Other than the EnviroLeach process, there is currently no economically viable and truly environmentally friendly solution to extract precious metals from E-Waste.

Due to the current highly fragmented nature of the E-Waste sector and the fact that the industry is still in the early stages of consolidation, there are still considerable opportunities for new technology based participants such as EnviroLeach to develop the necessary alliances and partnerships necessary to become significant players within the sector. The increased demand for green, environmental initiatives and the fact that EnviroLeach offers the only viable alternative to the current toxic processes used today, will contribute greatly to the rapid development of these relationships.
