Aether is pleased to report the following activity for the month of April:

In April, improvements for our synthesis equipment were fabricated, installed and experimentally verified to improve overall operability and offer better control of the synthesis parameters. The second stage of improvements was meanwhile scoped, assessed by a contractor, revised as needed and improvements are now imminent. Upon successful validation of the improvements the synthesis team will resume pursuing repeatable, testable production of catalyst material with the device. A second round of environmental control is planned to address emergent issues followed by the planned high throughput (lab scale) modifications.

The SORE team has completed the full-scale test bed assembly. Aether will use this equipment to assess various catalyst configurations for the lowest possible HC+NOx emissions using an approximation of the ISO 8178-4 test cycle. As previously reported, catalyst configurations have been pre-screened at lab scale. The full-scale stage is designed to de-risk the cost of third party emissions validation as much as possible. As such it constitutes a critical stage in our path to validation.
